With the service discovery model, we present a formal definition that explicitly captures key concepts associated with service usage and identification. We have used our definition to build a model-based system to aid service identification. A rigorous automated analysis technique is developed to identify a formal cause for a given service identification failure. The formal cause is used to create an abstract specification to check if a particular trace is valid. This abstraction eliminates the need for expert knowledge when creating specification-based test cases. Finally, we have extended our formal model to support multiple trace semantics, including the case where messages are lost in transit. The abstract specification model has been verified using our new formal cause analysis technique and a set of trace examples.The Miller Lite Lightbody project has been in limbo since the final design of a new beer container was shown to the brewery last week. Tom Giernanski, Miller's vice president for craft brewing, said Tuesday that the company is considering several options but no decisions have been made. A MillerCoors executive says the company wants to make sure its Lightbody containers don't cause a crisis for brewers when they're replaced next spring. The containers, which use a lightweight aluminum and polyester composite instead of steel, are in widespread use but are being phased out. The Lightbody — which is lighter, harder and more durable than a regular keg — is starting to be phased out at Anheuser-Busch, Miller says. At Miller, the company is still testing the Lightbody and doesn't know how they'll perform in the brewery, Giernanski said. The company also is looking into different designs for its new cans, which are 82157476af
